

12 Exhibitions To See in New York This Summer

These exhibitions running through July and August are reason alone stay in the city

June 26, 2017 | By Saskia Randle

Unlike most gallery exhibitions that seem to end the very moment you find the right time to go, these 12 New York galleries have exhibitions running through July and August—reason alone to stay in the city over summer, or come for a visit. From Leo Villareal's rhythmic light installations to Carsten Höller's whimsical hanging mushrooms, and Del Kathryn Barton's exquisitely detailed paintings to Erik Lindman's abstract explorations into the nature of painting, there's no shortage of variation to hold your attention and satisfy a range of artistic niches. And with explorations into topical subjects such as femininity, globalization, and notions of identity and values, these shows are sure to keep you thinking.

Through July 28th, Tyler Rollins Fine Art presents two new video works by Araya Rasdjarmrearnsook. One of the most influential Thai artists, Rasdjarmrearnsook's videos have a meditative, ritualistic quality, inspired by Thai Buddhism. They focus on the idea of communication between different realms: the living and the dead, the insane and "normal," humans and animals, and the worlds of art and "real life." The show is a meditation on what the artist calls "the inseparable entanglement of things/lives /subjects," a domestic environment where dreams and reality beautifully meld together. In one work, Four Monks with Three Ladies in Sanook Dee Museum, Rasdjarmrearnsook explores the meeting point between some of these oppositions. While serious issues of class and cultural differences are explored in her work, the videos also convey a sense of curiosity, humor, and joy that emphasize a common humanity. trfineart.com
